

About the National Conference

Target Audience: Occupational medicine, primary care and pulmonary physicians, clinic staff nurses, respiratory therapists, medical lab technicians, administrators, attorneys, lay representatives, outreach workers, benefits counselors, support staff and all others who work for victims of occupational pneumoconiosis.

Purpose: The purpose of this conference is to provide a review on the prevalence, severity, and spectrum of coal mine dust lung disease (CMDLD), current treatment modalities, and update on compensation programs for patients.

Following the conference, participants should be able to:

1. Describe the prevalence and severity of respiratory disease, diagnosed radiologically and physiologically in US coal miners.
2. Review the regulatory changes implemented by the Mine Safety and Health Administration over the years and discuss how these have impacted the health and safety of US miners.
3. Recognize how surveillance, disability, and mortality data can be used to characterize respiratory disease in mining populations.
4. Cite treatment options for miners suffering from fibrotic lung disease.
5. Identify therapeutic interventions for patients suffering from the most advanced stages of lung disease.

Continuing Medical Education Credits

Accreditation Statement: The Northwestern University Feinberg School of Medicine is accredited by the Accreditation Council for Continuing Medical Education (ACCME) to provide continuing medical education for physicians.
